

Location: second exit where we had our white spot lunch.

Based on the landscape of the parking lot and the small hill and the height of the school, I can imagine that if this piece of land were to have been left “untouched” and “undeveloped” that “here” would have a lot more trees and no concrete and not a parking lot and of course no school. Now that a school has and is located here, one of the drastic changes to the original land was made during the original construction of the school at the very beginning where the construction workers would’ve had to find a digger in a digging and flattening vehicle to flatten out the area for the large parking lot and for a structurally sound foundation for the school. Another drastic change comes with both positive and a negative aftermath... a major increase in population, (which happened long before the school was built) well deep cove (back then known as “deep water”) first become a place only where minors from the stone quarry would live, and then it eventually grew to small cabins and cottages in the 1910’s and then later grew and added “granting quarries lodge” in the 1930’s and thanks to the growth in population a school was built, seycove! in 1979 and still stands to this day and is now the school I attend! Even though I could go to Windsor if I wanted to (and it is closer to my house) but I wanted to go into PLP and also just for some “new scenery”
