

The American revolution is arguably one of the most historically significant events in history. This is because this revolution established a country by becoming independent from Britain. The three ways we can determine whether or not the American revolution was historically significant and important, are; Was the event recognized as being important as it was happening? How widespread and lasting were the consequences after the event? Also, has the event become symbolic or representative of key historical issues or trends? When factoring in all of these questions, all signs point to the American revolution being extravagantly significant. However, in all likelihood you could say that about most revolutions. When comparing the American revolution, to other revolutions, you find that the American one, has gained a lot of popularity in the western media, with things like Hamilton, History class, and famous artifacts, not unlike the Declaration of Independence. This is why the American revolution is one of the most talked about revolutions, and quite possibly, the most famous and recognizable one.
