

Source: <https://www.craft.do/s/dbFImgxULuZ5bC> (permanent note: <https://www.craft.do/s/8Z6BChuZBer7oV> )

Source 2: <https://www.craft.do/s/xOihGFKuzok02w>

When answering the question, how should we govern ourselves, I've included the source of my literature note on the political spectrum. I've done this because I think that the political spectrum might play the biggest part in learning what you want for your country, which is what you need to know to govern a country. So answering how should we govern ourselves? We should govern ourselves by identifying our political values and beliefs, making sure those align with people we want to collaborate with, and then we should make solid plans and projects, to work towards winning over the people, and getting the future we want. My other source is a literature note on doing internet research well. This can connect to the driving question in the way that being able to do internet research well, means bettering your understanding in everything, and doing that gives you foundation that you can use to build a platform. So connecting it all together gives you a fact; that you need to know yourself in politics before starting to try to govern others. Being able to research well has really nothing to do with politics, until you see that politics have something to do with getting to the source and, before you vote, checking the claims and doing your own research about candidates.