

HAS ALL OF THE QUALITIES

(Things that I say in this story are not my personal opinion, but based on implicit bias.)

It's Sam's first day of Life Guarding class. He wants to be there on time. On the way there, it takes just as long as Sam thought it would. He arrives right on time. They start with "get to know each other" exercises. "What elementary school did you go to?" Asks the instructor. "Blue Door." He answers. The instructor thinks this is a great elementary school! He starts to base his opinion of Sam off this.

To get into this class, you had to complete a form. On it, Sam put his name as Sam. The instructor is excited as he really wants a boy in his class. Sam also put his personal attributes. He said he was good at math, was a leader, and gets things done on time. The instructor is glad of all this. He bets Sam is good at math, as boy's tend to be. He is happy Sam said he was a leader, because the rest of his life guards need to be led. It makes him excited that Sam says he can get things done on time because that's how a life guard really should be.

That day was great! The instructor pushed them really hard, but it was fun. Sam was glad he was treating them all the same. Everyone in his class identified as male, and that was cool with everyone!

The moment Sam on time to his first life guarding class, the instructor was happy. The last person who had brown hair in his class had been really good. He hoped it would be the same with Sam. And Sam was tall. He really liked tall people. They were obviously very healthy and competent.

Sam doesn't know how to do a good dive. He was hoping that this class would help him. On his first time trying, he does a pretty good dive, except his feet splash into the water. Luckily, the guy before him was really bad. The instructor sees Sam is better, and is thrilled!

The instructor was satisfied with Sam's dive. He was glad it was better than the guy that went before him.

Sam is excited with how his first week of life guard training is going. When they are ready to see if they get to go to the next level, the instructor passes Sam without a doubt. When Sam goes up to him later, the instructor explains that 1) Sam was good at life guarding, and 2) he was very handsome and the instructor liked that.
